

RUSSIAN PHOTOGRAPHER GOES INSIDE CHERNOBYL REACTOR IN 1990

Posted on April 28, 2016 by tim

These days some editions try to commemorate Chernobyl incident or how they say in Russia "Chernobyl Catastrophe". The reason is because it happened exactly thirty years ago, in April 1986. So we decided to post something too. We posted the best spooky shots we could get our hands on. The story is as follows. Just four years after the incident, in year 1990, Russian photographer goes straight inside the destroyed reactor building, the most dangerous place in Chernobyl and took those photos. Scary.

Right here it all happened. Inside the Reactor No. 4. What a brave photographer, huh?

What shocks us most, it was a woman. Yes, woman-photographer risked her life to bring those photos to you 26 years later.

This is what she saw there.

There's really not much danger, if you have proper dosimetry and proper protective equipment. You have to be careful, for sure, and plan everything carefully, but it's way less dangerous than going e.g. to a bad area in a bad neighbourhood. Those women "undergoing procedure" in the photo are simply going through a "whole body meter", they have to do it every day in all nuclear plants even without any accidents, even today, all over the world, so there's nothing special about it.

The most spooky photo is the "elephant foot", google it. THAT thing was really scary. Another one is the photo of a heat exchanger with corium lava flowing out of the manholes.

I'm going to assume she's dead now. The whole thing sounds more stupid than brave. What did she show us that we didn't already know was there? Nothing.
