Dear FCC:

There are all sorts of music, talk, and sports outlets available to everyone outside of the world of satellite radio. Regular radio, Ipods, recorded CDs, television, and internet to name a few.

I am a long time Sirius subscriber, and I elect to pay money to enjoy content in a less commercial and less censored format. But satellite radio service is a luxury, non-essential product and people can freely elect to obtain the same type of programming all over the place. The merging of the two companies does not create a monopoly, and the free market forces will keep the company from being able to institute monopoly pricing.

The merger would afford me access to baseball radiocasts that now require me to subscribe to both satellite services.

Please do what you can to allow the free market to combine and allow me more choices.

Sincerely,

Flint Corey
