

USS Arizona Brothers

On December 7, 1941, Japanese bombs exploded into the hull of the USS Arizona, engulfing the ship in a giant fireball and leaving thousands dead. Amidst the destruction, one thing remained intact—the bond of brotherhood.

Like the waters of the Pacific, family ties ran deep on the Arizona. Serving aboard were a father and son and 38 sets of brothers. Naturally, they wanted to be together. Their families back home felt the same, but worried about losing all of their boys when disaster struck. These fears became reality as the sinking of the Arizona killed 23 sets of brothers and the father and son.

Similar tragedies early in World War II prompted the Navy to release a bulletin discouraging family members from serving together on the same ship. After this bulletin, no policies, regulations, or laws were made to enforce it. Even the deaths of five Sullivan brothers aboard the USS Juneau in November 1942 could not force a stricter policy, nor did it stop determined brothers from enlisting and serving together.

Today is no different as warnings are given to families requesting to be stationed together. Yet, if their ship is not in a hostile area they can still serve together. Their desire to be with family often overpowers the risks. Simply put, brothers want to be with brothers.

I think it bothered him his whole life that his brother went down when he was on shore leave. I think he felt like he let his brother and his shipmates down.

Brothers Edward and Wesley Heidt enjoy time with family.

As the Arizona tilted and sank, John Anderson was ordered onto a barge taking wounded men to safety. "I can't go, my brother's up there" refused Anderson as he was shoved onto the barge and taken to Ford Island. After landing, John knew he could not stay. He muscled his way back to the barge, ignoring the calls of "You'll get killed out there" and set out toward the sinking, smoking, flaming Arizona.

The Arizona brothers were more than comrades in arms, more than mere shipmates. Separated from their loved ones, they only had each other. This real "Band of Brothers" strived to remain together, even if it meant they died together.

Edward Heidt, F1c and Wesley Heidt, MM2c served and died as brothers aboard the USS Arizona.

MORE ABOUT THE MEN

• There were a total of 79 individual brothers, of which 63 died as a result of the attack.

• Of the 63 brothers who died, only four were recovered and identified: George Bromley, Donald and Joseph Lakin, and Gordon Shive. The remaining 59 brothers remain unaccounted.

• There were three sets of three brothers: the Beckers, the Dohertys, and the Murdocks. One from each set survived

• In addition to the brother sets, there was one father and son on the USS Arizona that were killed in action. The father was Thomas Augusta Free, MM1c; and his son William Thomas Free, Sea2c. Both men were from the state of Texas, but son William is memorialized at the National Memorial Cemetery of the Pacific, Hawai'i, under the state of California.

FOOTNOTES

1) State determination: For personnel killed in action, their next of kin's location is used. For survivors, their last known address or next of kin is used. This listing does not necessarily represent their place of birth, place of enlistment, nor original home state.

2) Andrew Allison is memorialized at the National Memorial Cemetery of the Pacific, Hawai'i, under the state of Tennessee.

3) The famous Sullivan brothers joined the U.S. Navy to avenge the death of William Ball.

4) John Albert Doherty is memorialized at the National Memorial Cemetery of the Pacific, Hawai'i, under the state of Montana.

5) Donald and Joseph Lakin's grave markers at the National Memorial Cemetery of the Pacific, Hawai'i, indicate their coming from the state of Kansas.

6) Francis and Norman Morse are memorialized at the National Memorial Cemetery of the Pacific, Hawai'i, under the state of Colorado.

7) The Warriners were the only set of Arizona brothers to survive the attack. Kenneth was training at Fleet Signal School in San Diego, California, although still assigned to the Arizona. Russell was wounded (badly burned), but survived.
