RPCV Public Health and Environment Career Events

May 24 and 25

Exploring Environmental Careers

By Sarah Walker (RPCV Lesotho, 1994-96), Winrock International

Within the past decades, environmental issues and environmental measures have moved from the sidelines of special interests, to garnishing global attention and action. Large technological and scientific advancements have been made, broadening our understanding of our environmental impacts and increasing the tools available to minimize negative effects. Additionally, climate change and environmental degradation are being directly felt by peoples worldwide.

RECENT ADVANCES

With this improved knowledge base and enhanced public awareness, non-traditional sectors have realized the critical role they play in the environmental sector. Local, national, and international governing bodies, the private sector, and nongovernmental organizations have all become active participants in shaping environmental regulations and response. United Nations conventions on air pollution, ozone layer, climate change, biodiversity, and desertification are steps toward worldwide cooperative efforts. Issues such as habitat loss, biodiversity, land cover change, deforestation, desertification, land degradation, chemical and toxic waste pollution, climate change, fishery depletion, water quality and quantity, and waste management plague our environment. This vast array of environmental issues also has an associated human component, such as food and water security, indigenous rights, health, livelihood preservation, and social discrimination.

PCV ENVIRONMENTALISM

Through their international experiences, PCVs had the opportunity to observe how environmental issues affect local peoples. This exposure led many PCVs to pursue a greater awareness and understanding of the environmental issues seen, often resulting in incorporating an environmental aspect to their primary or secondary projects. These opportunities were not always limited to agro-environmental projects such as environmental education and awareness, forestry, protected-areas management, agriculture and forestry extension, or applied agricultural science but often began in a disparate field. As projects progressed, PCVs realized the necessity of environmental incorporation. Therefore, it is not unusual to have seen IT projects that enabled resource-poor communities to use information and communications technology for charting their own environmental development; business projects wherein PCVs worked with individuals and communities to promote sustainable enviro-based income generating opportunities; education, youth outreach, and community development projects that targeted environmental awareness and health; and public health projects that organized and mobilized communities to improve potable-water storage facilities and heighten awareness of water and sanitation issues.

ENVIRONMENT CAREERS

The upsurge in the environmental arena has resulted in a parallel increase in employment opportunities. According to the Environmental Careers Organization, the "environmental industry" in the United States involves more than 113,000 private and public sector employers, providing jobs for nearly 1.3 million people, on revenues of $200 billion dollars in the year 2000.

Because of the size of the environmental sphere and the degree it impacts other sectors, associated occupational opportunities reach far beyond traditional scientific or conservation based employment. Environmental policy, project management, community based natural resource management, local activism, environmental health, formal education, informal education and skill transfer, and many other opportunities exist within the national and international environmental domain. Therefore, skills gained in other foci, such as those forged by PCVs in cross-cutting sectors, are able to transfer to the wide array of environmentally related occupational opportunities. ❀
