Peace Corps Week: The Perfect Opportunity to Share Your Peace Corps Experience

by: Jeff Achen (Nepal, 2002–2003)

As a writer, I love to share stories. My favorites, of course, are the stories from my Peace Corps days in Nepal. Peace Corps Week 2006 was the perfect occasion to talk about my Peace Corps experience in an editorial piece in my local newspaper. I also visited a local elementary school and two local high schools several times to speak about the Peace Corps and my service in honor of the Peace Corps' 45th anniversary celebration.

My service as a Volunteer in the Peace Corps remains the most rewarding experience I have known, and it has profoundly shaped my perspective on life. I left Nepal with a sense of close connection with a culture completely unlike my own. Upon returning to the U.S., I have come to appreciate the comforts we often take for granted. More importantly, the many life lessons I learned in Nepal have helped me understand how laughter, mutual affection, love of family, belief in God, and a desire for understanding can cross all cultural divides. And in reporting about my Peace Corps experience to my community, I thought it would be fitting to share my memories of cultural adjustment and relationship-building in my editorial piece, "Peace Corps Service Shapes Lives."

Speaking with students in my community about my Peace Corps experience was more fun than I imagined. For my visit to the local elementary school, I prepared a 30-minute presentation using photos I had taken while I was an English teacher in a remote hillside village school in Ilam. As I unraveled short stories of my Peace Corps service, I presented an array of colorful and creative photographs to illustrate the unique differences in culture, landscape, and wildlife. It was fantastic to experience Nepali life all over again as I explained how Nepali people celebrate the Hindu religious festivals and prepare meals each day, sifting through rice to look for pebbles before steaming it to perfection and adding spicy vegetables. While many students grimaced at my photos of squat toilets, they all giggled at photos of Nepali elephants, monkeys, and goats.

It was really fun to reminisce about the days when I had to trek 20 minutes from my second-floor concrete apartment in the municipal center up the hillside road to the little village school where I taught fourth- and sixth-grade English. I showed pictures of dilapidated huts and schoolchildren in old and torn clothes. The elementary class I spoke to hardly believed I taught children as poor as those in the photos.

The comments and questions from the students thrilled me. I was happy to see the students grasping the ideas of friendship, cooperation, and education that the Peace Corps experience embodies. I also explained how fortunate we are in America, compared with the poverty that pervades countries such as Nepal.

Speaking to high school students was a little different. The older students reacted with mixed interest to my educational photos and description of the living conditions, work demands, and challenges of the Peace Corps. While I found it useful to explain the realities, I also found it easier to engage this audience with anecdotes of my funniest Peace Corps experiences, such as linguistic misunderstandings.

Jeff Achen (Nepal, 2002-2003)

I had a Nepalese student named Buddha. For some time, I pronounced his name with a hard "d" sound instead of the soft "dh" sound and was calling him "old man" instead of Buddha! When my other students finally informed me of my pronunciation mistake I turned red. With similar humorous stories of my Peace Corps service, I also expressed my profound sense of excitement and pride in having served others and in representing the U.S. in such a positive way.

A number of students expressed interest in my experiences. I left with the feeling I had planted a seed for future service in the minds of some. Students in American classrooms are increasingly interested in world affairs, and I found that they can easily be motivated to think beyond themselves, especially when you take the opportunity to extend your Peace Corps experience to include classroom visits as an RPCV during Peace Corps Week, or any day of the year for that matter.
