ABSTRACT

This paper discusses the rationale for a new course in the history of American protest music which was offered during 1999 at the College of Mount St. Joseph in Ohio. Noting that the course was team taught by a U.S. history professor and a librarian with expertise in the area, the paper states that the course aimed to survey U.S. history through songs of protest and complaint, thereby telling the history of the United States from the bottom up. The paper lists learning outcomes and states that the course met twice a week for 75 minutes with an enrollment of 21 students. The class examined the following topics: What Is Protest Music?; Spirituals and Work Songs; Songs about Racism; Songs of the Wobblies; Songs of the Depression; Songs of Aunt Molly Jackson; Songs of Sarah Ogan Gunning; Songs of Woody Guthrie; People's Songs and the American Left; Songs of Pete Seeger; Songs of Bob Dylan; Anti-War Songs; Vietnam's Aftermath; The Talking Blues; Songs of the Civil Rights Movement; Songs about the Environment; Songs of Feminism; and Contemporary Protest Music. The paper contains an extensive discography and a 29-item bibliography. (BT)

This Lawless Spirit: Teaching the History of American Protest Music

As early as the fourth century BC, Plato acknowledged the power of music and its "lawless spirit" in his Republic. Music, he warns, "spreads imperceptibly to manners and pursuits; and from thence with gathering force invades men's dealings with one another, and next goes on to attack the laws and the constitution with wanton recklessness, until it ends by overthrowing the whole structure of public and private life." In the last year of the twentieth century, the College of Mount St. Joseph offered a course on the history of American protest music, confident that while society might not be overthrown by teaching such material, a number of students might be edified by it.

Preliminary research indicated that we would find few syllabi after which to model our own course. Courses devoted entirely to protest songs are rarely included in campus curriculums. Only two such courses were identified, and their scope was much more limited than ours would be, treating protest music from only 1965 to the present. (See the following web sites http://www.wfu.edu/~dixonpa/syllabus.html, and http://gater.sfsu.edu/issue10_s99/article/feature.html.)

Cross-listed in Music and History, the Mount St. Joseph course was offered to honor students and team-taught by an American History Professor and a librarian with expertise in the area. The course aimed to survey American history through songs of protest and complaint, thereby telling the history of America from the bottom up. Learning outcomes included: a.) demonstrating knowledge of songs of complaint and protest within their various historical contexts and musical traditions; b.) understanding the uses and values of song as a political weapon; c.) appreciating the role of the musician in affecting social and cultural change; and d.) analyzing protest songs for their message, musical style, and effectiveness.

The course met twice a week for seventy-five minutes and attracted an enrollment of 21 students, fairly typical for our institution and small enough for the class to be conducted as a seminar. The material was taught largely in chronological order, by the date of the song's authorship, or, in some cases, its recording.

More specifically, the course was presented in the following divisions. The number of class periods devoted to each division is given in parentheses. Artists and songs featured in each division are also listed.

Students were evaluated in the following manner:

40% Reaction papers on weekly topic (eight total, worth five points each)

40% Final paper on instructor-approved topic

10% Oral presentation on same topic as Final Paper

10% Attendance

What would the instructors change were the course to be offered again? The lack of a general textbook on protest songs resulted in a sometimes-inconsistent list of readings. A more varied approach to class presentations might also better sustain student interest. This became apparent whenever videos were used. Finally, it must be confessed that the instructors' disappointment in student performance betrayed an idealism all too apparent in many of the featured songs.

A discography and bibliography follow.
