Federal, State, and Tribal Underground Storage Tank Programs

Protecting The Nation's Drinking Water From Leaking Underground Storage Tanks

Groundwater is the source of drinking water for close to 50% of the U.S. population (approximately 147 million people). One of the greatest threats to the nation's groundwater is leaking underground storage tanks.

Underground storage tanks are found in every community and are as close as your nearest gas station. Large underground storage tanks store enormous quantities of petroleum and other toxic substances at businesses, factories, gas stations, schools, and marinas. These tanks can leak and release contaminants into the soil and groundwater. In surveys of state water programs, 35 states have identified underground storage tanks as the top threat to groundwater (U.S. EPA, National Water Quality Inventory: 2000 Report).

There are 650,000 active underground storage tanks in the U.S., many of them near drinking water sources. Federal, state, and tribal underground storage tank programs set standards and inspect these tanks to protect the nation's drinking water.
