The Environmental Protection Agency should grant a waiver for California's Clean Car Law, now that long-overdue hearings on the matter have concluded. California -- and other states seeking the same greenhouse gas reduction standards -- should have the right to adopt sensible regulations, in order to both protect the wellbeing of its residents and honor citizen demand for action against global warming.

Your agency's purpose is to protect the environment, and in this case you should empower California and other states to help in this mission.

If you can not or will not follow your history mission you should consider changing your name to the Environmental Prevention Agency or perhaps to Environmental Polluters Agency.
